Contrast enhancement, as described in the previous section, yields an image having a full range of intensities. However, highlights and shadows are blocked out. As long as we reallocate light levels on a global basis, what is an optimal reallocation for one area may not be optimal for another area—and there are not enough levels in the final medium to satisfy everybody at the same time.

Contrast enhancement on a global basis